RESEARCH EXPERIENCE

Doctoral research

University of Limerick, Ireland

2018 – 2026

Project: "Bringing politics back in: Causes and consequences of Positive and Negative Partisanship in Europe between 1989-2024" - Self-funded

Supervisor: Dr Rory Costello, University of Limerick

External examiner: Prof. David M. Farrell, University College Dublin

Internal examiner: Dr. Conor Little

- Examined partisan change in Europe between 1989-2024, challenging conventional accounts of long-term partisan dealignment by showing how renewed political conflict can reactivate both positive and negative partisan attachments.

- Provided a comparative longitudinal analysis of partisan change across Europe, drawing on harmonised European Election Study data covering 171,000+ respondents, 169 elections and 28 European Union member states, linked to party- and system-level datasets.
- Demonstrated that Positive Partisanship has experienced a renewed mobilisation in increasingly polarised European party systems, while Negative Partisanship constitutes a widespread and distinct political orientation whose development cannot be reduced to the same contextual processes.
- Established the behavioural relevance of Negative Partisanship by examining its independent contribution to electoral participation and the individual- and election-level conditions under which negative political identities become politically mobilising.
- Applied comparative and multilevel quantitative methods, including multilevel regression, mediation and moderation analysis, while developing reproducible data pipelines for the harmonisation and integration of individual-, party- and election-level data.
- Dissertation research forms the basis of an ongoing publication programme on political identities, party-system polarisation, mass–elite linkage and electoral behaviour in contemporary Europe.
